Positions each company for above market growth

The following is an excerpt of a speech accompanying a presentation to employees of the Company, which was made available on the Company's intranet on May 4, 2018:

So now, let me turn to animal health.

Animal health has been a fast grower for Henry Schein in the last seven or so years.

Our goal is to ensure that we go to markets in the best way for our practitioners.

The challenge the animal health practitioners are facing is very different to the medical and dental practitioners' challenges.

The challenges that the animal health practitioners are facing is a simple question: How can they ensure that when they're diagnosed a pet owner's pet with a particular ailment or they determine that a preventive is needed, how do they ensure that the pet owner fills the prescription and then gives the pet the pills or the ointments or whatever?

And when the prescription ends comes back for a renewal.

That is the big challenge.

And the other challenge is the movement of certain products from the practice into the retail store where, of course, the product can be bought but is not supervised by the practitioner.

The customer success go-to market model addressing that is the number one priority of Peter and our animal health team.

If you bear this in mind, you will understand what we have done.

And then we need to understand that we have to transform the way we sell in this business.

We have to aggressively drive towards our own control brands.

We've done good work there. Same with dental. Medical as well.

And we need to expand our ownership of brands that we control.

And yes, expand geographically, and I think our animal health business is the most geographically and most diverse business we have in more countries than any of the other Henry Schein businesses.

What this led to was a plan which we announced to merge two companies, Henry Schein's animal health business with Vets First Choice.

What is Henry Schein's animal health business?

75 percent of the veterinarians in the US do business with us.

70 percent Europe and in Australia and New Zealand, and we're the only global distribution channel for veterinarians.

We're also the only global player in providing practice management software to veterinarians and have the largest installed base of practice management software in the United States, over half the veterinarians.

But what we need is the ability to help veterinarians when they issue a prescription to ensure that that prescription is filled.

Do you understand what I just said? Are you sleeping? Jeff, wake up.

Because if you understand this, you will understand the logic behind what we did.

And it's really important to understand this, because this is for the benefit of all 22,000 team Schein members, our investors, and our customers.

Of course our suppliers as well.

The bottom line is if we don't help the veterinarian get compliance for the prescription that they've issued, we'll not have a veterinary business. It's as simple as that.

If we don't help them keep the prescriptions in the channel of veterinary medicine, we'll not have good veterinary medicine, because pet owners will start treating their own pets because they can get these products OTC in the Walmarts or whatever.

If you understand the strategy, you will understand why we moved ahead.

And Vets First Choice -- and all of this is on the Internet -- has the ability to help veterinarians get compliance with prescriptions issued. If you understand that, you understand everything.

What they do is helpful for the vet, because the vet issues the prescription, the right products are used, and the prescription is fulfilled through the veterinarian.

It's the right thing for the pet owner, because the pet owner gets clinical advice on the pills.

And the manufacturers love this because the biggest problem they have is they know they have good products but there's no compliance.

The compliance fill is what? 10 percent or something?

Less than two out of 12 prescriptions are actually filled and used.

This company, Vets First Choice, that we've been following for about eight years understanding and has know-how on how to get compliance.

The manufacturers of course like that because now their products are going to be used. And, of course, this presents huge growth opportunity for our team and the Vets First Choice team, because our team has been worried about this lack of compliance by pet owners since products were available in other channels.
